Ding Jie, who has served as a member of the CPPCC National Committee for 15 years since 2008, witnessed the changes in the attention the public paid to rare diseases. "In the past, it was 'I' suggesting, but in recent years it has become 'we,'" Ding said. The case served as a prime example to demonstrate how two sessions serve as bridge between the people and government, help the latter formulate policies and practically solve livelihood issues. globaltimes.cn/page/202403/13...
